College Seniors “Know” Less Than High School Seniors

A recent survey made by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching which covered thousands of college and high-school seniors has revealed that more than half of all high-school seniors have less "knowledge" than the high school seniors, they are sent out to teach. The test concerned facts of general information—hence we put "knowledge" in quotation marks. It was given to be ingrats, therefore, to note that this kind of job and expensive research would have been obviated by asking a few practice-teachers whether they knew more, less, or about the same amount of isolated facts as they knew when they were high-school seniors. Practically all of them would be willing to admit that they had forgotten a great deal of information in college than they had learned. But practically all of them would be equally mistaken in insisting that what they "know now" is more integrated, vitalized, applicable than what they knew then.

Testing the ability to assimilate and synthesize, the test measured the mental attitude toward education. Factual knowledge, scholarly detail, is incapable of correlating such material to solve a problem in a...
