Roosevelt and Willkie... No two presidential candidates as Wendell L. Willkie and Franklin D. Roosevelt have presented such strongly opposed views and policies in the political past as have the two candidates in the present campaign. If the two men and their philosophies. Willkie, the young man from New York, and Roosevelt, the thirty-six-year-old, have opposed each other on every issue from education, defense, and religion to taxation, the two men are no strangers to each other. Both have been closely identified with the New Deal which is now completing its eighth year in the political machine. The only difference is that Willkie, by his recent successes, has established himself as a national leader, whereas Roosevelt, by his greater age, has become a household name.

Basically the argument goes back to the old controversy of deciding what the role of government is. Roosevelt is the man who believes that government should take it upon itself to regulate industry and commerce. He believes that the government should control the affairs of industry and commerce in order to prevent business from making a profit. Roosevelt is the man who believes that the government should take it upon itself to regulate industry and commerce in order to prevent business from making a profit. Willkie, on the other hand, is the man who believes that the government should not interfere with the affairs of industry and commerce. Willkie is the man who believes that the government should leave the affairs of industry and commerce to the private sector. Willkie is the man who believes that the government should leave the affairs of industry and commerce to the private sector. However, the victory of Mr. Roosevelt is not altogether non-deserving of a vote at the ballot box. Today, more than ever, people are talking to Chesterfield because Chesterfield concentrates on the important things in smoking. You smoke Chesterfields and find them cool and pleasant. You light one after another, and they really taste better. You buy pack after pack, and find them definitely mild.
