BGSU promotes service learning in the health professions

The College of Health and Human Services has become involved with service learning this year through the Center for Healthy Communities. Housed at Wright State University, the center received a grant from the Corporation for National Service to create the Midwest Health Professions Service Learning Consortium to help health-profession students integrate service learning into their curricula.

BGSU is one of the five Ohio partners in the grant-funded project. The partners are paired with colleges and universities elsewhere in the region, BGSU with the University of Indiana.

Matt Webb, associate director of program development for the College of Health and Human Services, is the regional faculty member for the center. Next year he will present training workshops to other area faculty.

"We want to promote the idea of making service learning a part of the curriculum in order to better prepare students who plan to go into the health professions," he said. "Agencies need volunteers and assistance, and students need the experience. We're hoping to get the word out to faculty and potential community partners so they will be thinking about how they might use service learning in their courses and programs."

Younghee Kim, family and consumer sciences, received a grant this year through the center to bring service learning into her dietetics course, "Nutrition in the Classroom to Actual Life." Students in the course learn about the Federal Nutrition Program for the Elderly through hands-on experience.

Kim's students work with the Wood County Committee on Aging at its senior center in Bowling Green. They conduct workshops in a comprehensive curriculum designed to both teach them the federal nutrition program and provide service to the community. They deliver meals to house-bound senior citizens, assist at congregate meals at the senior center, in meal preparation and packaging, and in food-shopping for the seniors, and present nutrition education to the seniors.

"Adding the service-learning component to the course has been a great success," Kim said.

"Time after time, student after student, they say it is the best part of the course. Students say they can relate what they learn in the classroom to actual life. With these precise learning objectives, students grasp the scope of the federal program much better from the beginning."

Through delivering meals to seniors in their homes, the students "learn firsthand the value of service to the community," Kim said.

Beverage questions answered

Jane Schmitf, assistant vice president for auxiliary services and head of the University. Pouring Rights Committee, responds to questions posted to www.beverag@bgsu.edu.

Q: Why did BGSU decide to limit is contract to only two beverage suppliers?
A: Most universities have a contract with a single soft-drink supplier. BGSU was unusual in that it previously offered all three soft drink company lines. Now we will only be offering two, but the line-up of products is extensive. After reviewing proposals from a number of beverage suppliers, it was decided that the Pepsi company's offer was the most advantageous for the University.

Q: I really do hope the "powers that be" make the recycling of these new beverage containers possible. Please do what you can to help.
A: Recycling is a concern and plans are under way to review our program.

Q: There seem to be many more machines on campus, and some of the locations don't seem to work well. Might this change?
A: We have added 78 more machines to campus. We will be evaluating the locations over the next few months to determine if they are appropriate.

Q: Will fruit juices made entirely from fruit, with no sugar additives, still be available?
A: You will still be able to get 100% juice. The dining halls have the dispenser juices and Welch's is available in 10-oz bottles and Dole in 16-oz bottles.
