Finances are major concern of current freshman class

Students indicated little concern about topics such as sex and gender, race, religion, disability, discrimination and examining religion.

Another way to measure student satisfaction is to ask about specific programs or organizations they would like to see added. Twenty percent of the freshmen most interested in programs related to their major, sports and student government.

Men tend to be more interested in programs related to business, science and engineering. Many freshmen also indicated that programs related to travel and entertainment are important to them.

The three major concerns identified by students were: finances, computer and technology, and the environment. Some students also expressed concern about athletics and residence hall life.

Ohio State University's Vice President for Finance, Dr. Brian J. Nance, said that students are expressing concern about the state of the economy as a whole.

"We're seeing that students are concerned about their finances," Nance said. "They want to see the budget balanced in the next year or two, and they're concerned about the state of the economy as a whole."

Meanwhile, the university's budget for 1984-85 is expected to be $344 million, an increase of $21 million from the previous year.

"We're not seeing any major changes in the budget," said Nance. "We're seeing more of a steady increase, which is good for the university."

Music education
- "Music education" has come a long way since the days of the serving dean teacher who gave students a "zap" on the knuckle when they hit a wrong note. Someday soon, students may see the word "error" flashed on a computer screen instead of a reprimand.
- "Music education" has been introduced into middle schools and high schools in recent years. The voice of musical arts is now being taught in computerized environments.
