These questions were among the problems discussed by a representative of management and a representative of labor at the Wagner Act and the NLRB labor issues are occurring every day. You have a freedom of speech and press here, but you are violating the closed shop, hypertensive, and judicial restraint."

Mr. Kobrynski admitted that he came some labor union about their rights and those he has done. He said, "I believe in protecting the small laborer."

Rabinovitch's Pictures Shown
In Special Workshop Exhibit

The work of the world's outstanding photographers, Rabinovitch, is being featured in a special exhibit at the Art Workshop, directed by Walt Dehne, resident artist.

Thirty-five photographs of "Rabinovitch, Master and Puppet," make up the display, which these may be viewed Wednesday and Saturday from 3 to 7 p.m. in the art gallery.

The photography magazine "Photo" recently devoted an article to Rabinovitch, who, according to Missions, makes a definite effort "to transmit personality and to keep alive individuality."

Mr. Dehner, a graduate of Rabinovitch's school, described the master as being kindly and most helpful.

"One of the great regrets of my life," Rabinovitch writes in "Memoirs," "is that I can't portray people as easily as I do landscapes. As a photographer I think probably of things that are not there. This takes pictures with a camera I used to stand at the very top. Whether anyone will see the duplications, I don't know."

Born in Kishinev, Rabinovitch came to this country at the age of three. His parents found their home on the East Side in New York, but eventually moved to the Bronx where the camera came into his life.

He studied at City College, taught in the entrance examination at New York University, and went to work at Columbia where his work was done in biology.

A portrait of Rabinovitch by one of his students shows the exhibits in the show which the students, appears regularly in Vogue, Harper's, House Beautiful, Fortune, Collier's, and the Saturday Evening Post.
