Minature Science Building

By Henry Lewis

Inauguration, patience, and the effort of five days a hour for a period of four weeks on the part of Don Kienman resulted in a model of the proposed new science building. Don is the lad who, with razor blades, tweezers and small paint brushes, from almost everywhere, created this one-eighth scale model.

The building was to be designed, constructed to scale. The model was created of laminated orange wood, and the trees and shrubs are of spores, the plan to complete the entire structure was worked out with the aid of his brother. The work is complete, and now that the project is finished, one would never suspect the strange building materials used in its construction.

The Physics and Chemistry building... The site for the new building is just west of the southern section of the new area of the university. Construction will not be started until the necessary water mains become available.

Eighty students now live in construction, and they are working with their hands, but they are working with their minds too. The study accommodations are being planned so that the students can be comfortable.

Dr. Kienman, who is not a college student himself, is the architect of the building. He has been working on the project for three years. It is estimated that the building will be completed in 1948.
