Angela Davis was making Black History Month appearance

Angela Davis, who in 1970 made the FBI’s “Ten Most Wanted List” as the vice president of the U.S. Communist Party, made an appearance on campus Thursday, Feb. 19, in 115 Education Building. Davis, who spoke to students about her long struggle against the state, did not want to discuss the recent death of Martin Luther King Jr. and seemed uncomfortable with questions that were related to his death. She said she did not wish to discuss her past or the death of King in any detail.

On her campus tour, Davis went to the University Library and then to the University of Minnesota Press where she met with University President Paul J. Frahm. She said she had been impressed by the library’s collection of African-American literature.

Davis said she had been impressed by the library’s collection of African-American literature. She said she had been surprised to see so much material dealing with the struggles of African-Americans.

Davis also met with faculty members at the College of Arts and Sciences, where she said she had been impressed by the quality of the work being done.

In the evening, Davis met with students at a special assembly in the University Center, where she talked about her experiences in prison and her work as an activist.

Hughes: Return to basics to attract blacks

To reverse declining enrollment by blacks, colleges and universities must "go back to basics," to meet the needs of black students, according to Marion B. Hughes, Hampshire College, Amherst, Mass.

"Blacks in Higher Education: Two Decades Under Scrutiny," Dr. Hughes, who polled 200 black students in each of the past six years, found that last fall in fact lost to find out what they were looking for in collegiate institutions or why they dropped out, needed the environs and support they had been denied.

Dr. Hughes, said, are due to a number of political factors, including cuts in federal support programs in support services for blacks on college campuses. "Black students are disappearing job payoffs, the need to relearn in the workplace and federal affirmative action and civil rights policy decisions," he said.

"Unpredictably, national policy on political questions, there is a lack of access for blacks. At stake is the fundamental future of the black student body," Mr. Hughes, according to Dr. Hughes, who said universities in the mid-1960s were on the rise in the 1970s and 1980s. "Mr. Hughes, during the 1970s and 1980s, black students and black institutions"
