the cut system...
The University has a cut system which has been working reasonably well for a number of years, but a few members of the faculty are laying down their own rules for cutting classes.

Such instructors refuse to allow students even the legal number of cuts without lowering their grades or punishing them in some way. This attitude is fairly general and must obviously be underlined if the faculty wants the students to attend lectures.

Furthermore, when instructors take the attitude that they must lower the grades of any student who tries to cut classes, they only teach them to cut classes. If the students themselves attend lectures, and if the college students are kept as close as possible, the cut system must be rethought.

If cut classes fail for no valid reason, they are only cheating themselves, and if they are allowed to keep on cheating themselves, they may be led into a false sense of security.

Such an incident, disastrous in its way, occurred at Bowling Green last Friday when some individual without principles and who was not interested in his own welfare or in the college's welfare, decided to destroy the Delta Gamma's display of their candidates for next semester. That was why the present cut system was set up—

...All of this work shows great originality and an amazing knowledge of the instruments for which he has composed.

The first scene of the evening and possibly the most brilliant was for clarinet and piano. Opus 11, by Noah Knepper, was written in the year 1921. The two movements are of the first two movements, and in a manner, Knepper’s style of expression is singularly expressiveness and beauty of the clarinet's own natural and contemporary voice.

The good book on reservations has been vandaled; my answer was a form of patience runneth without end.

These few faculty members are trying to "lead home" students, and they should not be surprised when they get the present students.

"Other Voices, Other Rooms," the story of a 15-year-old boy who goes to live in the Swampland of the South with his grandmother. Joel Harrison is terrified and bewildered by what he encounters at Seely's Landing, a former cotton mill, but he learns to live with an idiotic wife and her mute mother. One day the Randolph, the perfumed artist, gives a Negro woman, seen with a teen-age negro neck equipped with a large muff, the name of his mistress, and then comes to see her. Somehow, Joel is depicted by the author as one through whom the wise were of the artist, and the reader will be expected to share the feeling in the hope that he too will reach the truth. This novel has been greatly appreciated by critics, and the author, Capote, because of his extreme youth has often been referred to with that unique classification reserved for artists who create something extraordinary and apart from anything else. Today, it can even move Capote in his first book, the young author reveals an extraordinary power to create atmosphere and mood, but the method in which he goes about his writing is not new or original. Rather it is suggestive of other southern writers, notably William Faulkner who used the same technique of suggesting hidden hidden. His subject material - perversion, sex, charac ters - who are more like human beings—all with a great variety of idiosyncrasies, has become a very old theme, indeed. The total effect is not an outstanding novel, but a promise of something better to come. Last week in the book, Truman Capote will meet to do a great deal of work, and then he will make up of people before he can reach the same idiosyncrasy, an accomplished writer.
