Risky business: You still have to look both ways before crossing street

According to Jean Yam, parking and traffic, many University employees and students have the impression that they always have the right of way when crossing a street.

However, right of way laws directing pedestrians and motorists are exactly the same on the off-campus side of the Ohio River as they are on the campus side.

City Police Chief Dan Gale said pedestrians have the right of way when crossing streets near the University, but the right of way does not apply to streets crossing the right of way.

When a pedestrian is crossing a street, the pedestrian has the right of way, Gale said.

City Police Chief Dan Gale said if a pedestrian has stopped off the curb and is about to make a crossing, the vehicle has the right of way to continue traveling but the pedestrian has the right of way to make the crossing.

"There is a very fine line to that as well as who has the right of way," he said. "It's anyone's guess as to when the pedestrian will have the right of way in that particular instance, but the vehicle has the right of way when the pedestrian has not violated the right of way law by not following the pedestrian rules.
