TuSmallerchallenges students in their multicultural lit classes

The students were divided into groups, each assigned a specific multicultural literature to study. The groups then presented their findings in a class discussion, allowing everyone to learn about the diverse cultures represented in the literature.

The students found this approach to be both challenging and rewarding. They enjoyed the opportunity to explore different perspectives and gain a deeper understanding of the world around them.

The experience helped the students to develop critical thinking skills and a greater appreciation for cultural diversity. They also developed a greater sense of responsibility to their fellow students and to the community at large.

The course was highly successful and the students are enthusiastic about continuing the work they started in the multicultural literature classes.

In conclusion, the students were grateful for the opportunity to take part in this innovative and thought-provoking course. They acknowledged that the experience had enriched their lives and that they would carry the knowledge and skills they had learned with them for the rest of their lives.

The students' enthusiasm for the course was reflected in their academic performance, with many students achieving excellent grades and receiving positive feedback from their instructors. The success of the course was a testament to the value of multicultural education and the importance of providing students with the opportunity to engage with diverse cultures and perspectives.
TuSmith challenges students in their multilingual litocrits

Bowen discovers scrutinizing insurance bills has its payoffs

Brownon the front

TuSmith says the geography depart- ment is currently undergoing a reorganization that could affect her. She said she was concerned about the impact of the reorganization on the department and was working with other faculty members to address any concerns.

The university's administration has expressed a commitment to maintaining a diverse and inclusive environment, and the department is working to support faculty members in their efforts to create a welcoming and supportive learning environment.

Bowen's role as a member of the multilingual student body is particularly important as the university seeks to promote greater participation and representation from diverse groups. She is working closely with other faculty members and administrators to ensure that all students feel valued and supported.

In conclusion, Bowen's work is an important contribution to the university community, and her insights and perspectives are valuable to the university's efforts to promote diversity, equity, and inclusion.

TuSmith agrees with Bowen's perspective and is committed to working with other faculty members and administrators to ensure that all students feel valued and supported.

However, she also recognizes the importance of maintaining a strong and supportive academic community, and she is working to ensure that all students have the opportunity to participate fully in the university's academic and extracurricular activities.

In summary, Bowen and TuSmith are working together to promote greater participation and representation from diverse groups, and their efforts are making a valuable contribution to the university community.
Training program helps drivers obtain license

A program to assist drivers in preparing for a driving test will be held at 2 p.m. April 22 in the Student Union.

For those who cannot "pass" the test, five study sessions, a half-hour test session and a practice session will be offered from 9 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. April 20.

The driver’s license program (DLP) is a requirement for Class II and Class III vehicles to be operating on state highways or city streets.
