Black History Month events planned

The University will mark Black History Month with an extensive series of events continuing into March, culminating on March 22 with the Africana Studies Student Research Colloquium. Films, lectures, discussion groups, special menus in the dining halls and music will be featured.

A highlight of the month is the four-day visit of the Voices of Africa group, Feb. 5-8. VOA is made up of five women who present a cappella songs and traditional African drumming from across the African diaspora. They will give a family concert in Kobacker Hall and work with BGSU classes and area school and church groups to share the rich culture of Africa and its descendants around the world.

See the Monitor calendar for a full listing of February events and further events in March.

Nieman book explores ex-slaves' use of new legal and political power

From the standpoint of the 1960's Civil Rights Movement, the Emancipation Proclamation and resulting Reconstruction in the American South might be viewed as a failure in achieving the rights of citizenship they were intended to accord black citizens.

A new book edited by Donald Nieman, dean of the College of Arts & Sciences, and Christopher Walderup, who holds the Packer Chair in History at San Francisco State University, demonstrates that Reconstruction did initially accomplish its goal and that the attainment of civil rights was a seismic event in the lives of African Americans. In fact, during the period of Reconstruction, black people made excellent use of their newfound legal and political power to establish economic success. Local Matters: Race, Crime and Justice in the Nineteenth-Century South, published recently by the University of Georgia Press, contains nine essays on the intersection of law and race relations as drawn from local court records from counties throughout the South.

Taken together, they underscore the reality that political power is necessary to make the legal system responsive.

Local Matters reveals some larger themes and highlights some unexpected findings. First, Nieman noted, he was surprised to discover the "assertiveness and sophistication with which African Americans used the legal process to defend their rights and expand their freedom." An important aspect of this was their participation on juries, he added, which gave them much more influence in their communities. Another key aspect was their large-scale participation in the political system and the extensive political infrastructure they created.

"The nine case studies emphasize the connection between political power and the rights of citizenship. What we see is that the law alone can be a pretty weak reed in protecting rights," Nieman said. "But when you can elect your county sheriff, he will be much more likely to defend your rights. African Americans became very adept at using political power to expand the meaning of freedom and its consequences."

Another surprising finding was that black leaders tended to be former slaves, Nieman said, and not the few educated black people. "They were extraordinarily courageous leaders who faced violence, assassination and terror," he said. "It is perhaps a testament to the budding success of former slaves that they were viewed as such a significant threat to whites that whites responded by forming terrorist groups such as the Ku Klux Klan. "Violence and terrorism finally brought about a closed system in which African Americans were not able to exercise their Constitutional rights," Nieman said.

Nieman said when the Olympians ascend the dais to receive their medals in Salt Lake City this month, they can feel secure knowing they are protected by a strong security force of police and Secret Service agents. One of those policemen will be Sgt. John Shumaker of the BGSU police.

Shumaker will spend Feb. 4-27 at the Winter Olympics, where he has been assigned to the medals pavilion. He explained that this year's medal presentation process will be different from previous Olympics.

"Instead of the hockey team, for example, receiving their medals right there on the ice after the games, this time there will be a large presentation ceremony every night in the medals pavilion, with fireworks and a show by top-flight entertainers," he said. Shumaker's primary job is to provide security at that site, but he has also been assigned to work with the Secret Service, which he assumes will mean providing a uniformed presence when needed. As a certified law enforcement officer, he will have full powers of arrest.

Another change this year is that the police team will be armed. Shumaker also worked at the 1996 Olympics in Atlanta, for which he was not required to carry his gun.

However, the scarcity of police officers in the state of Utah and recent national and

BSGU 'family' joins to support its scholars

The BGSU Family Campaign, an annual giving program for current and former employees of BGSU, kicks off Feb. 12 in the Multi-purpose Room (Room 228) of the Bowen-Thompson Student Union. Will he get to attend any of the games? He’s hoping to, he said. His wife and daughter will visit for three days, and he hopes to join them for some of the figure skating and snowboarding competitions.

Here in Ohio, his Olympic service has made Shumaker almost as much a celebrity as the athletes he is assigned to cover. Newspapers, television and radio stations from around the state have interviewed him, and he will give live interviews from Salt Lake for one TV channel. “The response has just been overwhelming,” he said.

international events prompted the governor and the International Olympic Committee to ask the 620-member auxiliary force to be armed, Shumaker said.

Security will be very high, extending out 150 miles from the city itself to the sites of some of the events, such as the skiing competitions. A seven-block area downtown will be closed to vehicles, and magmeters and other security measures will be used, he said.

Shumaker will be housed at Camp Williams, about 10 miles south of town, he noted.
